COLOSSAL FEATURES MAGAZINE

I'M AGIN KILLIN

RUFE was the quickest man on the draw in Taunton by the time he was sixteen. And little wonder, with a dad like Sam Seton. Sam was sheriff of Taunton—had been for fifteen years, and he was proud of his son's prowess.

"Rufe will make a very fine sheriff some day," he would explain proudly to anyone who would listen. "Yes, sir! Can beat me to the draw already. Just watch that youngster's smoke."

But Rufe had no stomach for the sherifing business. Taunton was a tough town. Being sheriff meant killing, taking men's lives. Something in him rebelled at the idea. It was alright shooting at old bottles to show off his skill, but taking the life of a man—well, that was something else again. He wanted no part of it.

Sam Seton was saddened at the news that his son would not follow in his footsteps. But he didn't hold it against the boy. "Man's got to make up his own mind about them things," he said. "If that's the way you feel, alright then. Way I look at it is that if you kill one skunk you may be savin' the lives of a dozen honest men."

About this time the Barton gang began to stir up things. First there was the coach hold-up outside of Taunton. That started it. Then there were the murders in the Happy Days Saloon. The townsfolk called a meeting and there were hurried conferences. Then Marshal Phillips came down from the County Seat. There were big doings in Taunton, with posses coming and going.

The Barton gang did not take kindly to the proceedings. They wanted their own kind of law in Taunton, and tried to set up their headquarters in the town. Many of the bandits were known to the people of Taunton, but they did not dare stand up to them singly. The sheriff began to find threatening notes nailed to his door. He wasn't afraid of them; but it would have been so comforting to know that his son stood with him, or if he went down, that his son would take up the Sheriff's office and avenge him. But Rufe didn't like killing; thought that no man's hand should be turned against another. Sam Seton was worried for the boy; this was a tough six-gun land, and there was no law and order which could not be enforced by guns.

Then one day a dozen masked men held up the Taunton Bank, killed the cashier, blew the safe and made off with every dollar in the bank. The bank of Taunton was blown higher than a kite. It was no more.

In the middle of the proceedings the Sheriff was informed at his home that masked men were looting the bank. He strapped on his two sixes and hurried out to the street in time to see the string of masked horsemen going off with their loot. The Sheriff blazed away at them, and was pleased to see the leader, Jeff Barton himself, drop the bag of bullion he was carrying and make a grab for his leg. He turned in his saddle and blazed away at the Sheriff. Before he went out of sight he scored a hit—and struck the Sheriff in the arm.

There was no use trying to follow them into the malpais of canyons and badland, where they could hide for months on end if they had to. Besides, it was treacherous country, where a posse could fall easy prey to ambush. So Sam Seton cut across the street to old Doc Ryan's to get his arm patched up.

Old Doc Ryan washed it off with alcohol, scratched his head, and opined it was nothing but a flesh wound. But it would mean no more gun play for many a day to come. The Sheriff swore. To lose the use of his good right arm at a time like this! It was unthinkable.

The next morning, when Rufe came through the door into the office, there was a note pinned to it with a knife. It was addressed to the sheriff. It said:

"To the soon-to-be ex-sheriff of Taunton:

There don't seem to be enough room in this town for two of us, so you'll have to go on your way. I'm coming in to git you, and make no mistake about it, I will. I'll come a-shooting, and if you have any guts, you'll meet me in the streer and see how fast you can reach for your shooting-irons.

Yours for a short and happy funeral,
Jeff Barton."

He took the letter in with him and laid it on his father's desk. Then he went out again, got on his horse, and went off riding into the hills. He had to think, and the high, overhanging cliffs had always been a refuge to him when he was troubled.

So Jeff Barton himself was gunning for his father, and Jeff was a dead shot, faster on the draw than any man in Taunton—with the exception of himself, perhaps. And he bated killing. Why did men have to take each other's lives, in the crazy code of the West? For by that code, his father would have to accept the challenge of the outlaw, and meet him in open combat. It made no sense.

But Jeff had put himself outside of the law. He was a law to himself. And if the sheriff didn't get him first, the outlaw would go on looting and killing, so that no one in Taunton would be safe.

But suppose Jeff never got a chance to get into town! Suppose he were stopped before he got there, say in these hills! It sounded plausible.

So deeply was he lost in thought, that he hardly heard the three men riding down upon him until they were almost in sight. He backed into the thicker just in time for the three horsemen to pass him. Then he saw that one of them was Jeff himself, headed into town, and the other two were his lieutenants.

As they went past, he fell into line. So Jeff was taking his two henchmen with him! He was taking no chances. How lucky he had come out this way.

Near the outskirts of the town, Jeff took the old mule trail, and motioned his men to come into town by the back road. Rufe had to make a quick decision. Should he follow Jeff—or the two men? He decided on the latter course. They were two, Jeff was only one.

The back road was longer. What was happening in the meanwhile? Would Jeff open fire on his father? Perhaps not, else why bring these two other men into town?

Near the old hotel, the two men dismounted and took their places on the porch, guns drawn. They must have had a preconceived plan. They were ready for business.

Rufe climbed up the water-drain to the upper porch of the hotel. From here, come what may, he would have the drop on them and also be able to see up the main street.

He looked down the street and his heart stood still. There was Jeff Barton, in front of the sheriff's door. Carelessly Barton shot a blast at the door, shouting:

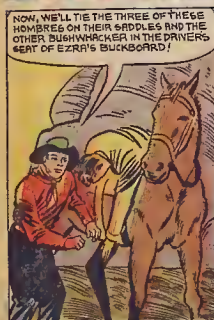

"Come on out, if you're not yellow!"

Faces appeared at many windows, but no one interfered. The two men below Rufe got ready for action. Now Rufe could see it all. It was an ambush. Jeff would shoot, and these two would follow up. His father would die like a rat, caught between crossfire.

But the sheriff did not come out the door. He came from the back of the office, through the rear door. Jeff spotted him, and blazed away. The sheriff fired back. The two below raised their guns, but Rufe fired twice, and the two men dropped their guns, holding their shattered gun arms. Then Rufe turned his attention to Jeff, but Jeff had hit the dusty street, a bullet in his head.

Sometimes, thought Rufe, a man had to kill. Sometimes.

→ FURY commands and no man can refuse!

DEAR FRIEND: It was in a cafe in Singapore that I first met FURY. She was the most beautiful and exotic woman I have ever known. Men killed each other just for her favors. And when she beckoned, men leaned to obey. For this was the POWER OF FURY, and no man dared to refuse her.

And so I blended an exotic perfume called FURY. I called it FURY because it captures the great POWER OVER MEN that FURY had. And like that exotic dancer, FURY commands, and men leap to obey because they fear FURY.

If YOU would like to try the exotic POWER OF FURY, just send me your name and address. When the postman delivers FURY, deposit only $2 plus postage with him (2 for $5) on my GUARANTEE: Try the POWER OF FURY for only 10 days. If you are not satisfied, I'll send you $2 back. But please use FURY carefully. It is very powerful.
